Blogging: Installment Plan for Publishing Your Family's Story

Many people have ancestors whose stories are worthy of retelling, yet the task of publishing a family history book seems daunting. If you want to tell your family's stories, there is another, simpler route to sharing: creating a blog. Short for "weblog," the term "blog" represents an online forum where you can share your research notes and stories. A blog is easy to set up, easy to use, and often can be done for free. Learn about the options for setting up a family history blog, and the ways in which blogging can inspire you in your research and connect you with fellow researchers—maybe even the proverbial cousin with all the photos and family mementos to share.

While Jacqi Stevens claims she was born wanting to know about her roots, it wasn't until her college years when she actively began pursuing her family's stories. She is a genealogical researcher, writer of over 3,000 articles on her blog, A Family Tapestry, and educator in beginning genealogy, genetic genealogy, and blogging at the Stockton Institute for Continued Learning and other organizations. With a Bachelor of Music in Therapy and a Master in Public Administration, she served local governmental agencies for many years. Currently a principal at Summit Solutions Consulting, she serves as President of the San Joaquin Genealogical Society.
